Contents

Poor Comprehenders in the Classroom: Teacher Ratings of Behavior in Children With Poor Reading Comprehension and Its Relationship With Individual Differences in Working Memory
Hannah Pimperton and Kate Nation 199

Pinpointing the Deficit in Executive Functions in Adolescents With Dyslexia Performing the Wisconsin Card Sorting Test: An ERP Study
Tzipi Horowitz-Kraus 208

Global, Broad, or Specific Cognitive Differences? Using a MIMIC Model to Examine Differences in CHC Abilities in Children With Learning Disabilities
Christopher R. Niileksela and Matthew R. Reynolds 224

Naming Abilities in Low-Proficiency Second Language Learners
Katy Borodkin and Miriam Faust 237

Monitoring Early First-Grade Reading Progress: A Comparison of Two Measures
Nathan H. Clemens, Edward S. Shapiro, Jiun-Yu Wu, Aaron B. Taylor, and Grace L. Caskie 254

The Effect of Grade Norms in College Students: Using the Woodcock–Johnson III Tests of Achievement
Markus N. Cressman and Laura Liljequist 271

A Functional Near-Infrared Spectroscopy Study of Lexical Decision Task Supports the Dual Route Model and the Phonological Deficit Theory of Dyslexia
Itamar Sela, Meltem Izzetoglu, Kurtulus Izzetoglu, and Banu Onaral 279

About the Artist: Annika Sandmann’s face lights up with a big smile as she talks about her art piece, Mexican Sun: “I made it out of clay. It was originally made to hang in front of a light. You would put a light behind it and when you turn it on, the light shines through the pretty colors, just like the Mexican sun. I like bright colors.” Annika, age 8, attends Springer School and Center in Cincinnati, Ohio. Through its day school and outreach programs, Springer empowers students with learning disabilities to lead successful lives. Annika says, “I like art because you can make anything you want. You get to show the world how beautiful it is. Also, artwork lets you really show who you are and your talents.” In addition to being a talented artist, Annika also plays the violin, runs track, and practices yoga. She lives with her parents and younger sister.